House Bill No. 2459

EXPLANATORY NOTE

Last June 24, 2006, Republic Act 9346 was enacted into law thereby prohibiting the imposition of death penalty in the Philippines. While the rationale for passing the law was very clear and noble, there are some sectors of society who believe that this law is not just and equitable because while foreigners may not be executed in the Philippines for drug trafficking, Filipinos who commit the same are executed in other jurisdictions.

One argument against RA 9346 is made in context of drug related crimes. Many foreign nationals are now emboldened to establish their drug factories in the Philippines because once convicted, they only suffer life imprisonment as opposed to the penalties that they may suffer in their countries which is in some cases death (i.e. China).

There have been constant reports of foreign nationals, including Chinese nationals, being caught selling drugs and operating drug dens and laboratories in the Philippines. And once caught and convicted, the penalty that our local courts may impose is only life imprisonment. This is a sad, or even unfair situation because when Filipinos are caught drug trafficking abroad, they may be imposed the death penalty, as seen in the most recent execution of the three Filipinos in China, namely Elizabeth Batain, 38, Sally Ordinario-Villanueva, 32, and Ramon Credo, 42.

And just last July 3, 2013, a 35-year-old Filipina was executed despite pleas from the Philippine government. She was caught last January 25, 2011 with 6.198 kilos of heroin in her luggage at the Hangzhou International Airport and was sentenced to death in 2011.

While there is no reason to question the laws of foreign countries, we must however, ensure that our countrymen do not suffer the short end of the stick. As such, there is a need to amend our laws to ensure that foreign nationals caught violating our laws on drugs be also convicted of the harshest penalties that their national law imposes.

In view of the foregoing, immediate passage of this bill is earnestly requested.
